Building on her previous work on foreign languages in an era of globalization, Professor Kramersch will present recent developments in applied linguistics that are redefining what it means to learn and use one or several additional languages. She will also highlight current trends that are challenging the very nature of language and language education.

Claire Kramersch is Professor Emerita of German and Education at University of California, Berkeley. Her area of research is applied linguistics, with emphasis on social, cultural and stylistic approaches to language study and she has published numerous books, articles, and chapters in these areas.*
